THE EXECUTIVE SWIPE FILE

Twenty-five of the best performing posts we published for B2B founders and executives this year, with the real numbers attached and the pattern underneath each one. Including the two that bought enormous reach and returned nothing.

WHAT THIS IS

I'm a partner at RallyUp, where we write LinkedIn for B2B founders and executives. In 2026 we've driven 9.6 million impressions across 24 accounts at 16 companies, from more than 750 posts.

This is the part of that work worth stealing. Every post below is real, every number comes from the account's own analytics, and the accounts are anonymised because the posts belong to the people who published them, not to me.

What I've kept is the shape: the angle, why it worked, and the thing you can lift without copying anyone's words.

> The honest promise. These patterns move numbers on accounts that already have something to say. None of them manufacture a point of view, and none of them will rescue a post about nothing. If a guide tells you a format is the reason something worked, it's selling you the easy half.

READ IT IN THREE BUCKETS

Every post we ship gets filed before it's written. Top of funnel, middle, bottom. We run roughly 70 / 20 / 10, and the only rule that matters is that each bucket gets graded on a different number.

BUCKET	BUILT FOR	GRADED ON
Top	Reach. Personal story, a take on something happening this week, humour	`Impressions`
Middle	Trust. The breakdown, the analysis, the thing you learned at volume	`Saves, profile views`
Bottom	Action. The role, the launch, the raise, the offer	`Comments, applications, calls`

Grade all three on impressions and you'll kill the two that are working.

THE FINDING THAT SHOULD REFRAME THE REST

Two posts, published one day apart, on the same account.

	A HIRING POST	A VIRAL PERSONAL POST
Impressions	15,376	178,179
Profile views	230	213
New followers	24	13
Saves	37	11
Comments	49	22
Sends	14	2
Engagement rate	1.33%	0.089%

The second post reached 11.6 times as many people and lost on every single measure that matters. Same account, same week, same writer.

If you only take one thing out of this document, take that. Reach is the cheapest thing on the page to count, which is why everyone counts it.

1. INTRO POSTS

The highest converting post most executives will ever publish, and the one almost nobody plans properly because it feels like a warm-up.

01 · PARTNER AT AN EARLY-STAGE VENTURE FUND, 11 YEARS AT THE FIRM, FIRST POST EVER TOF

"Hello LinkedIn, I'm here, and here's why I'm finally showing up"

50,137	1,899	218	784	118	45
IMPRESSIONS	PROFILE VIEWS	FOLLOWERS	REACTIONS	COMMENTS	SAVES

The angle. Not a bio. A dated timeline of one career at one firm, the admission that posting felt unnatural, and five specific things he'd write about next.

Why it performed. 37.9 profile views per thousand impressions, which is roughly ten times what his later posts do. A new account gets an outsized first push from the algorithm, and an introduction is the one post where talking about yourself is the entire point rather than a tax the reader pays.

Steal this. End the intro with the list of what you'll write about. It turns a follow into a subscription, and it commits you in public to a beat, which is the part that actually keeps people posting in month three.

02 · THE SAME ACCOUNT, TWO WEEKS LATER MOF

The follow-up that got more reach and less of everything else

69,980	994	159	159
IMPRESSIONS	PROFILE VIEWS	FOLLOWERS	SAVES

The angle. He asks all 128 portfolio companies for a quarterly update, so he published the one he writes about himself. Deal funnel, time allocation, which founders he was genuinely useful to, and what he missed.

Why it performed. 39.6% more reach than the intro and about half the profile views, which tells you the two posts did different jobs. But look at saves: 159, a rate of 2.27 per thousand. That's the highest in this entire file. People save a thing they intend to copy.

Steal this. Publish the internal artifact. Not a description of your process, the actual document, with the uncomfortable section left in. His longest section is "what I missed."

2. LAUNCH POSTS

Our highest engagement rates across every account we run, because a launch gives people something to react to that isn't an opinion.

03 · PHARMA MARKETPLACE, PRODUCT LAUNCH ALONGSIDE A $4.5M RAISE, VIDEO

The one that bought 137 hours of attention and 15 clicks

181,619	64,122	137.2	28	15
IMPRESSIONS	VIDEO VIEWS	HOURS WATCHED	FOLLOWERS	LINK CLICKS

The angle. A new model nobody had seen, explained as a video, with the raise and the investor names carried inside the same post rather than split into two.

Why it performed. 61,963 separate people watched some of it. And fifteen of them clicked. That isn't a failure, it's what video is: a viewer is not sitting in a clicking posture. Engagement rate came in at 0.06%, the lowest in this file, on the biggest post in this file.

Steal this. Use video when the launch is about belief, a category or a vision or why you bothered. Use text when the launch is about a thing somebody has to do this week. Then grade it on the right number.

04 · AI MENTORING MARKETPLACE, WAITLIST LAUNCH, TEXT AND IMAGE

Two funnels in one post

38,291	554	343	36
IMPRESSIONS	LINK CLICKS	COMMENTS	FOLLOWERS

The angle. The post asked for two actions on purpose. Comment below, and fill in the form on the site.

Why it performed. A fifth of the reach of the video above and 37 times the clicks. The comment is free, public and takes four seconds, so people do it, and every comment pushes the post to more people who then comment. Most of the qualified signups never touched the link.

Steal this. Put a comment gate and a link in the same post. The field has largely abandoned the comment gate on taste. The data doesn't agree with the taste.

05 · AGENT INFRASTRUCTURE FOUNDER, PARTNERSHIP ANNOUNCEMENT

Launching on somebody else's momentum

17,759	100	20	12
IMPRESSIONS	PROFILE VIEWS	SAVES	FOLLOWERS

The angle. A partner company had just raised a $24M Series A. Rather than a logo-swap announcement, he explained what the two products do together, in one line a reader could repeat: if they're the chip, we're the computer.

> Why it performed. 20 saves on 17,759 is a strong rate for an announcement, which normally saves at near zero. The analogy is the reason. People save a sentence they can use in their own meeting.

> Steal this. Announce partnerships on the other company's news cycle, and give the relationship a one-line metaphor. "We integrate with X" is a press release. "If they're the chip, we're the computer" is a thing somebody repeats for you.

3. HIRING POSTS

We've hired our entire team through these. They reach the fewest people of any post type in this file and they outperform almost everything on the measures that aren't reach.

06 · OUR OWN FOUNDER, HIRING A FOUNDING GTM ENGINEER

The post that beat a viral post by every measure except views

15,376	230	37	49	24	14
IMPRESSIONS	PROFILE VIEWS	SAVES	COMMENTS	FOLLOWERS	SENDS

The angle. Opened on frustration rather than a job title. Four bullets on who'd be right, an honest line that the role isn't for everyone, and an application mechanic with a filter inside it: comment with something you've built, and he'd only reply to comments with a personal video attached.

> Why it performed. 37 saves and 14 sends. A send is somebody forwarding the role to a specific person, which is the single most valuable action on LinkedIn and the one nobody optimises for. Nothing gets forwarded like a good job.

> Steal this. Put the filter in the ask, not in the screening call. Asking for a video in the comment cost him nothing and removed 90% of the applicants before anybody's time got spent. He said so publicly afterwards, which became the next post.

07 · THE FOLLOW-UP, SIX DAYS LATER

Reporting on your own hiring post

22,908	183	32	9
IMPRESSIONS	PROFILE VIEWS	COMMENTS	SAVES

The angle. What the applications actually looked like. Some spelled his name wrong on an application to do outreach. Fewer than one in ten sent the video the post asked for. He turned it into encouragement for job seekers rather than a complaint.

> Why it performed. More reach than the hiring post itself. A hiring post is an event, and an event has a second day. Most people publish the role and then go quiet until it's filled.

> Steal this. Every launch, raise and role has a follow-up post in it, made entirely of what happened. You already have the material and it costs you nothing to collect.

08 · PHARMA MARKETPLACE, A SENIOR HIRE ANNOUNCEMENT

The hire as a signal about the company

1,580	53	10	4.1%
IMPRESSIONS	REACTIONS	COMMENTS	ENGAGEMENT

The angle. Not "delighted to welcome." Why the role exists, what breaks without it, then her actual record with named companies, then a line about what he decided in the first sixty seconds of the interview.

Why it performed. 4.1% engagement, among the highest rates in this file, on one of the smallest audiences. Small, specific and warm beats big and generic on the measure that reflects whether people cared.

Steal this. Write the hire announcement as an argument about where the company is going. The person is the evidence. "We're expanding fast across two regulated markets, and here's who makes sure implementation never breaks" tells a buyer more than a quarterly update does.

4. THE MIDDLE OF THE FUNNEL

Where trust gets built. Graded on saves and profile views, never on reach.

09 · VENTURE PARTNER, ANSWERING A CRITIC IN PUBLIC

Taking the strongest argument against you seriously

45,252	510	37	30
IMPRESSIONS	PROFILE VIEWS	FOLLOWERS	SAVES

The angle. A founder had challenged him in the comments of an earlier post: what use is an investor who has never founded anything? He opened by conceding the premise, then answered with nine months of counts from one portfolio company. 59 intro meetings, 13 candidates approached, 2 hires, 1 follow-on cheque.

Why it performed. 11.3 profile views per thousand, roughly triple his baseline. A public disagreement handled generously makes people want to look at who you are.

Steal this. When somebody challenges you in a comment, don't reply in the comment. Reply in a post, name the challenge accurately, and answer it with counts rather than conviction.

10 · VENTURE PARTNER, A CONTRARIAN POSITION ON HOW HIS OWN INDUSTRY WORKS

Disagreeing with a named peer, respectfully

34,434	43	52	9
IMPRESSIONS	SAVES	FOLLOWERS	SHARES

The angle. He credited another investor's framework by name, said it was the clearest explanation of the model he'd seen, and then explained why he thinks it's wrong for early stage. Four screening questions he uses instead.

Why it performed. 9 shares is high for a text post. Crediting the person you're disagreeing with is what makes a disagreement shareable rather than a fight people avoid forwarding.

Steal this. Name who you're disagreeing with and steelman them first. The post gets better and the person you named often shows up in the comments, which doubles the reach.

11 · OUR OWN FOUNDER, THE THREE-BUCKET MODEL

Publishing your own numbers, including a post that flopped

4,453	9	17
IMPRESSIONS	SAVES	PROFILE VIEWS

The angle. He compared two of his own posts, one with 12 times the reach of the other, and showed that the smaller one won on followers, comments and saves. Then gave the 70 / 20 / 10 split.

Why it performed. Low reach, 2 saves per thousand. This is a middle of funnel post doing exactly its job: a small number of the right people filing it away.

Steal this. Publish the post that underperformed, with its numbers, next to the one that worked. Nobody does this, which is the entire reason it lands.

12 · AGENT INFRASTRUCTURE FOUNDER, A FRAMEWORK WITH LEVELS

Naming the thing everyone's stuck on

471	3.6%
IMPRESSIONS	ENGAGEMENT

The angle. Five levels of agent autonomy, with level one described as "it worked once, it cost $20 in tokens, and nobody knows if it'll ever run again." Then the line that does the work: the market demos at level one and sells at level four.

Why it performed. It barely reached anyone and still ran at 3.6% engagement. Worth including precisely because the reach is bad. A framework post is a bet that the right 400 people see it.

Steal this. Give the levels unflattering names and put your own category somewhere in the middle. A maturity model where you're already at the top reads as marketing.

13 · AGENT INFRASTRUCTURE FOUNDER, TAKING A PUBLIC POSITION ON AN INDUSTRY LETTER

Attaching yourself to a bigger story, with a reason

5,715	113	45
IMPRESSIONS	REACTIONS	PROFILE VIEWS

The angle. A very large company had published a letter. His company signed it. Rather than announcing the signature, he explained what open weights actually mean for a buyer: your data, your systems, your edge stay yours.

> Why it performed. 113 reactions on 5,715 is a 2% reaction rate. Newsjacking usually fails because the post adds nothing to the news. This one translated the news into the reader's own risk.

> Steal this. When you join a public position, skip the announcement and publish the translation. What does this mean for the person reading, in their language, about their money.

5. PERSONAL STORY, THE TOP OF THE FUNNEL

70% of what we publish. Graded on impressions and nothing else, which is the only reason it's allowed to be this personal.

14 · OUR OWN FOUNDER, THE DAY HE WAS LET GO

"48 minutes after getting fired, I posted about it"

18,864	184	7	76
IMPRESSIONS	PROFILE VIEWS	SAVES	REACTIONS

The angle. He lost the Slack, the inbox and every partnership he'd built. The one asset that travelled with him was the audience on his personal account. Then the argument: of everything you build inside a company, almost nothing is portable.

> Why it performed. 9.8 profile views per thousand. A story about loss that resolves into a transferable argument, rather than into a lesson about resilience.

> Steal this. The worst professional day you've had is usually your best post, but only if it ends in an argument somebody else can use. Without that it's just a story about you.

15 · OUR OWN FOUNDER, TURNING DOWN THE BIGGER RAISE

"A Tier 1 VC told me my company could sell for $150 million, then told me to get out"

42,589	332	10	13
IMPRESSIONS	PROFILE VIEWS	FOLLOWERS	COMMENTS

The angle. The investor loved the business and passed anyway, because an excellent company wasn't a fund returner. Then the honest part: he's 27, newly married, new baby, and he's not certain he wants the moonshot. He says outright that he still gets a little green reading funding headlines.

> Why it performed. 7.8 profile views per thousand on a text post with no image. The admission of envy is doing the work. Most founder posts about choosing sustainability over scale read as a decision already made peacefully.

> Steal this. Leave the unresolved part in. "I'm not pretending this is set in stone" is the line that stops it being a humblebrag.

16 · FOUR-TIME FOUNDER, THE PITCH EVERYONE REJECTED

"VCs gave me a 0% chance"

3,018	42	80	7
IMPRESSIONS	PROFILE VIEWS	REACTIONS	SAVES

The angle. A marketplace with a cold-start problem, solved by three named drivers who recruited their colleagues one cab at a time until 3,000 were on the platform before launch. Then the connection to what he's building now.

Why it performed. 2.3 saves per thousand on a story post, which is unusual. The specific mechanic is what gets saved. Three named people and a number is a tactic; "we hustled" is an anecdote.

Steal this. The origin story needs one operational detail a reader could actually copy. Without it you've written an autobiography.

17 · OUR OWN FOUNDER, SELLING WITH A BABY STRAPPED TO HIS CHEST

The imperfection as the strategy

2,931	41	30%
IMPRESSIONS	REACTIONS	REPLY RATE CLAIMED

The angle. He recorded one-minute cold videos for each prospect while walking his newborn, spit-up on his shirt in seven of them, and closed 15 deals. The argument is that the mess is what proved a person made it.

Why it performed. Modest reach and a very high engagement rate. It also carries its own disclaimer: he says plainly he isn't telling you to put a baby in your sales pitch.

Steal this. When your tactic sounds like it could be read badly, say so inside the post. The disclaimer buys you the right to tell the story.

18 · AGENT INFRASTRUCTURE FOUNDER, THE PIVOT THEY NEARLY DIDN'T MAKE

"We almost didn't launch"

3,678	29	80
IMPRESSIONS	PROFILE VIEWS	REACTIONS

The angle. Three founders from one industry, months of finding nothing worth building in it, and the sentence one of them finally said out loud. Then the reframe: not knowing the space is what let them see what was broken.

Why it performed. 2.2% engagement. The fear is named precisely rather than gestured at, and the conclusion is addressed to a specific person: the founder sitting in that room right now, arguing themselves out of it.

Steal this. End the story by naming who it's for. "If you're the person currently doing X" converts a story into advice without a lecture.

19 · FOUR-TIME FOUNDER, AGAINST THE OVERWORK CULTURE

Taking the unpopular side of a live argument

4,477	11	5
IMPRESSIONS	COMMENTS	SAVES

The angle. He calls the 72-hour work week a disgrace, and then immediately concedes that he personally works seven days a week and loves it. The position is about measuring output rather than hours, not about working less.

Why it performed. The concession is why the comments are real. A post that only attacks the other side gets agreement; one that admits you're closer to them than you'd like gets argument.

Steal this. Find the part of the position you're attacking that you're guilty of, and put it in paragraph three.

20 · OUR OWN FOUNDER, THE EQUITY THAT NEVER VESTED

A number in the news, made personal

13,209	224	39
IMPRESSIONS	PROFILE VIEWS	REACTIONS

The angle. A company he worked at hit a $60 billion valuation. His equity would have made him a millionaire if it had vested. It didn't, because he left to move abroad. No regret, just the arithmetic and what he chose instead.

> Why it performed. 17 profile views per thousand, one of the highest rates in this file. A headline everyone saw, attached to one person's actual consequence.

> Steal this. When a number from your past is in the news this week, you have a post. The news does the reach and your consequence does the rest.

21 · FOUR-TIME FOUNDER, THE STUDENT TALK

An opening line that has nothing to do with the point

1,931	39	60
IMPRESSIONS	PROFILE VIEWS	REACTIONS

The angle. "25 years ago, I let my university scan my brain for $200. They promised to send me the results. I'm still waiting." Then four companies in four unrelated industries, and why staying in one lane is the thing that limits you.

> Why it performed. 20 profile views per thousand on a small post. The opening buys the first three seconds with something genuinely odd, and the odd thing is true.

> Steal this. The hook doesn't have to be the argument. It has to be true, strange and short. Most people write a hook that summarises the post, which is the one thing a hook shouldn't do.

6. THE EXPENSIVE LESSONS

Two posts that reached enormous numbers of people and returned almost nothing. These are in here because they're the most useful pages in the file.

22 · MARKETPLACE CEO, A MOTIVATIONAL ONE-LINER OVER AN IMAGE

72,076 impressions. Seven followers.

72,076	7	22	331
IMPRESSIONS	FOLLOWERS	SAVES	REACTIONS

The angle. "The most successful people have a worse hit rate than you think." A sentence, an image, a sign-off.

Why it's here. Three weeks earlier, the same account published a launch post that did 38,291 impressions and filled a waitlist in a day. This one did nearly double the reach and produced seven followers. Reach is not the scoreboard, it's the cheapest thing on the page to count.

Steal this. Nothing. That's the point. If a post can't be graded on something other than impressions, you already know what it's going to return.

23 · OUR OWN FOUNDER, THE VIRAL ONE

178,179 impressions and 11 saves

178,179	213	13	11
IMPRESSIONS	PROFILE VIEWS	FOLLOWERS	SAVES

The angle. His father-in-law asked over dinner whether AI was about to replace his whole company. A fair question, answered properly, about why taste survives commoditised words.

Why it's here. It's a good post. It is also the exact post the hiring post beat on followers, saves, comments, sends and profile views with 11.6 times less reach. Published one day apart. Judge them on the same number and you learn the wrong lesson from both.

Steal this. Keep publishing these. Just file them as top of funnel before you write them, and never let a quarter's strategy get decided by the one that went big.

24 · OUR OWN FOUNDER, THE FOUR-SECOND POST

The joke that outperformed the essays on followers

6,547	9	17
IMPRESSIONS	FOLLOWERS	COMMENTS

The angle. Two lines, formatted as a LinkedIn celebration announcement, about eating dinner in a hut for a religious holiday.

Why it's here. Nine followers from four seconds of work. The 42,589-impression founder essay in this file produced ten. Effort and return are not linearly related on this platform, and pretending otherwise is how people burn out in month two.

Steal this. Keep three or four of these in the bank for the weeks when the real post isn't ready. Cadence matters more than every post being substantial.

25 · OUR OWN FOUNDER, THE ONE THAT ASKS FOR THE BUSINESS

What a bottom of funnel post is actually allowed to do

4,286	28	7
IMPRESSIONS	COMMENTS	SAVES

The angle. The full arc: a cold inbound message from an investor, a wire eight days later, seven months building something nobody wanted at $1,000 of revenue, the pivot, and then the numbers. Only after all of that, the offer and a guarantee.

Why it's here. 4,286 impressions, the lowest reach of any post on that account that month, and it's the one that asks for money. That's the trade. You get 10% of your posting slots for this and you spend them on the strength of the other 90%.

Steal this. Earn the ask with the failure. Seven months at $1,000 of revenue is what makes the guarantee credible.

WHAT THIS CAN'T DO FOR YOU

The honest part, because the rest isn't believable without it.

These are 25 posts from 24 accounts, not a law. B2B, founder and executive led, almost all on LinkedIn, mostly in tech, healthcare and finance. If you sell to consumers, treat everything here as a hypothesis.

The patterns don't manufacture a point of view. Every post in this file came from someone with something specific to say, usually something they'd earned the right to say. The format is the cheap half.

These are reach and engagement numbers, not attribution. I can show you 230 profile views and 37 saves. I can't draw a clean line from a save to a signed contract, because LinkedIn doesn't give that to anyone, and people who claim it are usually counting something else.

Account size changes everything. A 471-impression post on a small account and a 178,179-impression post on a large one are not comparable, and I haven't normalised for it. Read the rates, not the totals.

THE ONE PAGE VERSION

1. File every post as top, middle or bottom of funnel before you write it. Roughly 70 / 20 / 10.
2. Grade each bucket on a different number. Impressions, then saves and profile views, then comments and applications.
3. Write the intro post properly. It's the highest converting post you'll publish, and it only happens once.
4. End the intro with what you'll write about next.
5. Video for belief, text for action. Expect 137 hours of attention and almost no clicks from the first one.
6. Put two actions in a launch: a comment and a link. They're separate funnels.
7. Publish the internal artifact, with the uncomfortable section left in.
8. Answer your critics in a post, not in the comments, and answer with counts.
9. Put the filter inside the hiring ask. Ask for something that takes effort.
10. Every launch, raise and role has a follow-up post made of what happened.
11. Keep four-second posts in the bank for the weeks the real one isn't ready.
12. Never let the post that went viral decide next quarter.
