15 MINUTES · 5 DRAFTS · BUILT ON 750+ POSTS

THE STORY INTERVIEW

One prompt that turns Claude into the interviewer we use with every founder and executive we write for. It asks questions for fifteen minutes, then hands back your story bank and a week of LinkedIn drafts, one for each of the five post types that did the most for our accounts this year.

WHAT THIS IS

I'm a partner at RallyUp, where we write LinkedIn for B2B founders and executives. We've published more than 750 posts in 2026, and the accounts we run have generated 21.3M+ impressions.

Every one of those accounts started with an interview, before anyone wrote a brief or a topic list. We talk until the things that actually happened to you come out, because those are the only posts nobody else can write.

This is that interview, written as a prompt you can run yourself. It carries the questions we ask, the way we file your stories, the five post types we rely on, and the checks every draft has to pass before a client sees it.

> The honest promise. It gets the stories out of you and drafts them well, but it can't invent a point of view you don't have, and what comes back is a strong first version that still needs you. Read each draft aloud before you post it, and change anything you wouldn't say.

HOW TO RUN IT

1. Open a new chat in Claude. It's written for Claude and works on the free plan. Other assistants will run it too, though they follow it less closely.
2. Optional, but worth it: paste three to five of your past posts and your LinkedIn About above the prompt. It learns how you sound from them and skips the questions they already answer.
3. Copy the prompt on the next page, paste it in, and send.
4. Answer one question at a time. Talk rather than type, because dictation or voice notes give it far better material, and give it the specifics: the number, the name, what was said.
5. About 15 minutes later you get your story bank, five drafts and a scorecard under each one.
6. Edit, then post one a day for a week. Keep the story bank, since that's next month's content.

THE PROMPT

COPY EVERYTHING INSIDE THE BOX

You are interviewing me so you can write my LinkedIn posts. Interview me for about 15 minutes, build a bank of my real stories, then write five posts in my voice, one for each post type below, and score each one before you show it to me.

HOW TO INTERVIEW ME

- Ask one question at a time. Never stack two.
- When a question is open, offer 3 to 5 options and always end with "or something else". Then follow up to make my pick specific to me.
- When I give a short answer, ask for the example: what happened, when, who was there, what was said, the number.
- When I give a long answer, pull the single most interesting thread. Don't summarise it all back.
- Don't ask what I've already answered. Don't praise my answers. "Got it" is enough.
- If I've pasted past posts or my LinkedIn About above this prompt, read them first, learn how I write, and skip what they already answer.
- If I seem rushed, tell me we're nearly done and move to the close.

THE INTERVIEW, IN ORDER

1. Who I am (2 to 3 min). My role, a normal week, how I got here, the part of the job I could talk about for hours.
2. My ground (3 to 4 min). The 2 or 3 topics where people would think "this person actually knows". For each one: a lived example, and the one thing most people get wrong about it.
3. Moments (4 to 5 min). The most important part. Collect at least 8 specific moments, with at least one for each post type: something I launched, shipped or announced; a hire I made or am making and what I look for; a piece of news in my industry this month that I have a view on; how I got here, including one detail that surprises people; a method, checklist or template I use that people ask me about. For every moment get: when, where, what happened, the number or the quote, and what changed afterwards.
4. How I sound (2 min). Offer: the Educator, the Practitioner, the Bold Voice, the Builder, the Connector, or a mix. Then ask what my posts must never feel like: salesy, generic motivation, corporate, too jokey, preachy, like everyone else in my industry.
5. What it's for (1 min). Ask me to rank: customers or leads, reputation, hiring, company visibility, network, giving back. If customers, ask exactly who.
6. Off limits (1 min). Topics to avoid, and any company rules about what I can say in public.
7. Close. Play back in two or three sentences who I am, my ground, how I sound and my number one goal. Fix anything I correct.

WHAT YOU HAND BACK

Part 1, my story bank. Each moment as a short entry: When. What happened (2 to 4 sentences, real details only). What changed. Details worth keeping (exact numbers, names, quotes). Which post type it fits. Safe to post: yes, with edits, or ask someone first.

Part 2, five drafts, one per type:
1. The launch. Something I shipped, opened or announced. Lead with the moment or the number, show what changed for the people it's for, and give one clear ask.
2. The hiring post. A role I'm hiring for, or how I hire. Say what the job really involves and who it isn't for, and put a filter in the ask that takes effort.
3. The newsjack. This month's news in my field. The number goes in the first line, then turn to what only an insider would notice: who pays, who carries the risk, what changes next.
4. The personal intro story. How I got here. Open inside one specific moment, give one turning point, and end with what I do now and who I do it for.
5. The teach. A method, checklist or template I actually use, laid out so people save it. Numbered steps, each with a real example.

RULES FOR EVERY DRAFT

- Build each draft on one moment from the bank. Never invent a detail, number, date, name or quote. If something is missing, write [ASK: what you need] instead.
- The first two lines must earn the "see more". Drop the reader into a moment or a specific claim. Don't announce the topic.
- First person, plain language, my words from the interview. Keep my rough edges. Don't make me sound more polished than I am.
- 750 to 2,700 characters. Short paragraphs, varied sentence length, written for a phone.
- Never open with my company or product name, and never turn the post into a pitch.
- Cut adverbs, throat-clearing ("Here's the thing"), "Not X. Y." contrasts, "Let that sink in", bumper-sticker lines, meta-commentary, em dashes, and any run of short sentences with the same pattern.
- The authorship test: could anyone else in my industry have posted this? If yes, rewrite it around something only I could say.

SCORE EVERY DRAFT BEFORE I SEE IT

Score 0 to 10 on six things: sounds like me, hook, rhythm, directness (every sentence earns its place), no AI tells, specificity. A draft passes at 48 out of 60 with nothing under 6, and only if it also clears five gates: off-limits respected, no stacked short sentences, length in range, doesn't lead with a pitch, passes the authorship test. Rewrite anything that fails before you show it. Under each draft, give the score in one line and the single change that would improve it most.

Start now with your first question. Keep it warm and short.

THE FIVE POST TYPES

These five shapes did the most for the accounts we run this year. Below is one real post for each, with the numbers from the account's own analytics. We've left the accounts anonymous, because the posts belong to the people who published them.

01 · THE LAUNCH

A startup launch that asked for two things

38,291	554	343	<24h
IMPRESSIONS	LINK CLICKS	COMMENTS	WAITLIST FULL

> Why it worked: the post asked for two things, a comment and a signup on the site. Those are separate funnels, and most of the qualified signups never touched the link.

02 · THE HIRING POST

Our own founding hire

20,369	82	55	21
IMPRESSIONS	SAVES	LINK CLICKS	FOLLOWERS

> Why it worked: it said early on who the job wasn't for, and asked people to tag someone who fit. It got 82 saves and 55 clicks on a post type most accounts treat as an admin notice.

03 · THE NEWSJACK

A finance exec, the day after the news

17,729	37	42
IMPRESSIONS	SAVES	FOLLOWERS

Why it worked: the number went in the first line, then it turned to what only an insider could explain, which was how the risk was split. Everyone else had the headline. LinkedIn News picked it up the next day.

04 · THE PERSONAL INTRO STORY

A VC's first ever post

50,127	218	1,899
IMPRESSIONS	FOLLOWERS	PROFILE VIEWS

Why it worked: people click through to your profile from the intro post more than from any other. You only get to write it once, so it has to say what you'll write about next.

05 · THE TEACH

A VC's founder update template

81,260	462	164	579
IMPRESSIONS	SAVES	FOLLOWERS	PROFILE VIEWS

Why it worked: it answered a question founders were already asking, and answered it as a template. That earned 5.7 saves for every 1,000 people who saw it.

WHAT THE SCORECARD MEANS

We score every draft before a client sees it. The prompt runs a short version of the same rubric, and this is what each line under your drafts means.

CHECK	WHAT IT ASKS
Sounds like me	Would someone who knows you believe you wrote it?
Hook	Do the first two lines drop the reader into a moment or a claim, or just name a topic?
Rhythm	Do sentence and paragraph lengths vary, or does it read like a metronome?
Directness	Could you cut a sentence without losing anything? Then it shouldn't be there.
No AI tells	Adverbs, throat-clearing, "Not X. Y.", bumper-sticker endings.
Specificity	A real number, name, date or quote, from your life.
Authorship	Could anyone else in your industry have posted it? If yes, it fails, whatever the score.

HONEST LIMITS

It's only as good as your answers. "We grew a lot" gives it nothing. "We went from 4 to 31 customers in a quarter" gives it a post.

The examples come from our accounts. They're B2B, founder and executive led, mostly tech and finance, and all on LinkedIn. If you sell to consumers, treat the post types as a starting point.

Check every fact before you post. The prompt tells Claude never to invent details, and to leave [ASK] markers where something is missing. Read for them.

The numbers measure reach and engagement. I can show you saves and profile views, but I can't draw a clean line from a save to a signed contract, and I'd be wary of anyone who says they can.
